Did not he, who ordaind the day, Ordain night too. And in the greater world display What in the lesser He would do All flesh is Clay, thou knowst; and but that God Doth use his rod, And by a fruitfull Change of frosts and showres Cherish and bind thy powrs, Thou wouldest to weeds and thistles quite disperse, And be more wild than is thy verse. Sickness is wholsome, Crosses are but curbs To check the mule, unruly man; They are heavens husbandry, the famous fan, Purging the floor which Chaff disturbs. Were all the year one constant Sun-shine, wee Should have no flowres; All would be drought and leanness; not a tree Would make us bowres. Beauty consists in colours; and that's best Which is not fixt, but flies and flowres. The settled Red is dull, and whites that rest Something of sickness would disclose. Vicissitude plaies all the game; Nothing that stirrs, Or hath a name, But waits upon this wheel; Kingdomes too have their Physick, and for steel Exchange their peace and furrs. Thus doth God Key disorderd man, which none else can, Tuning his brest to rise or fall; And by a sacred, needfull art Like strings, stretch evry part Making the whole most Musickall. The Tempest. Ow is man parcell'd out how every hour Shews him himself, or something he should see! This late, long heat may his Instruction be; And tempests have more in them than a shew....
